Ring Around My Finger

I Past tense verb up Saturday morning not knowing that I would soon be off on a motorcycle ride with Caleb. (Honestly, I'm not even sure Caleb knew we were going for a motorcycle ride.) The weather had been pretty Adjective and Adjective lately, not exactly conducive to Adjective open air rides up through tea country.

Fortunately his work schedule slowed down and the weather cooperated. Well, it looked like it was going to cooperate until we were halfway to our destination and big Adjective black Plural noun loomed up in the sky. I think both of us were simultaneously bombarding heaven with prayers for Noun. Me, because I was already cold and him, well, he had ulterior Plural noun altogether.

 He changed course to avoid the impending ________ and headed towards some beautiful _______
 Plural noun ________

 Plural noun _________ he had visited once before. We _________ the bike and wandered around the lush, green fields __________ lovely wild flowers and _________ fresh air far from Nairobi smells and sounds. But for Caleb this was just not quite the right _________ and so we moved on.

gave us a second glance.

A few more paces and we reached the Khalid A place Farm. A bit confused as to where the Pc of scenery from earlier was actually supposed to be we inquired from the non-English speaking Kenyan A job position. He pointed us onward and we followed a Adjective grassy path down towards the sound of Adjective Noun .

One wrong turn later we reached the Pc of scenery from earlier and boy was it ever stunning! The

Last noun choice was cascading down a sheer rock face that was covered in vines and small, purplish

Noun. Upon descending the stairs we saw a gorgeous Noun in the mist.

After a number of photos, he paused the photo op dropped to one Abody part and declared he had an important question to ask me while he pulled the noun from his pocket. His "Will you marry me?" was followed by an adamant "Yes, of course!"
