Brians Winter- Blythe

An arrow anywhere else might have meant the end for Brian. Instead the arrow lodged itself in a major artery, but the moose still had life in it, and _____ Verb - Base Form _____ at its foe, convinced to kill him before his own death. Before passing out, Brian _____ Adverb _____ asked himself if this was the moose that attacked him this summer, and then knocked out. He thought of when he was younger and his mother called him for dinner, and then saw a white light, and thought he was done for, until he comes _____ Preposition _____ and found then moose's head on his chest and discovered the moose was dead. In today's pages, the scene _____ Pronoun _____ just described happened and was also a rising action. A rising action is when the action in the book increases, and gives the reader suspense _____ Coniunction _____ urges them to go on. In this portion of the story, Brian is out hunting, the _____ Noun _____ was going to kill _____ Proper Noun _____, so of course the action will increase. Afterwards we have a falling action, which means the action decreases, because all that Brian does is skin the moose and take meat and _____ Adjective _____ hide into his shelter. Wait! But was that really the moose that attacked Brian? If not, will it ever come back?
