When my name was Keoko

A Noun and Noun alternate as narrators in Newbery Medalist Park's well-constructed novel, which takes place from in Japanese-occupied Korea. The Japanese government forbids the Korean language to be spoken and the country's flag to be, and even forces Korean families like and roper Noun to change their names (Sun-hee becomes Keoko).
Through the use of the shifting narrators, Park subtly points up the differences between male and female roles in Korean society; and the father's process of choosing the Japanese name speaks volumes about his strength and intelligence. As the war intensifies, each family member asserts his or her individuality, from
