Puma and the Bear Word Lib

One day Puma took his           noun           hunting with him. The Bear came to Puma's           noun           and saw his wife there, and immediately fell in love with her. "I wish to have her for my wife," he thought. Then he went in to where she was           verb          . In only a short time, he proposed that she           verb           away with him. She consented and ran away with the Bear. When Puma returned, he could not find his wife. "I wonder if she could have eloped with that Bear?" he mused. At first he and his son saw no           clue          , but eventually they picked up the couple's trail.           emotion           by now, Puma followed the Bear tracks. A high wind began to           verb          , obliterating most of the tracks. The next day Puma found them again and followed on. "Perhaps they are in that           noun                     shelter          ," he thought. As he           verb           closer, he heard           sound           and recognized his wife's and the Bear's. He sent his son to circle the           noun          , approaching from the other side of the wood to force the Bear out toward Puma. The woman said, "Puma is very           Adjective          ." "But I am stronger," said the Bear, seizing a cedar tree and           verb           it from the ground. "He is           verb ending                     in er           than that," said the woman. The Bear had his moccasins off when Puma's son attacked. Quickly the Bear put on his moccasins, but in his haste he put them on the wrong           noun          . Then, not knowing who was coming behind him, he           verb           forward into Puma. The two grappled and Puma threw the Bear to the ground. The Bear rose up again and charged at Puma, who           verb           the Bear down against a rock and broke the Bear's           body part          . Then Puma sent his wife away into the woods, letting her know that he did not want her for his wife again. Puma and his son left on another           type of trip           trip to find a new wife and           shelter           for themselves.
