Enable Others to Act

In order to promote full _____ Noun, we required participants to _____ Verb their calendars while they were in residence. This requirement also served as a small test of their willingness to delegate--could their shop run effectively for a week without their constant attention.

One of these _____ Determiner was a woman named Sue from a large public utility. In getting to know her in the first residential week, she told us that one of her many responsibilities was to present a quarterly business status report to the CEO and senior management team. She had done several of these presentations and had received kudos from the top _____ Noun - Plural on what a great job she did. We also learned that one of these meetings was scheduled for the week following the program's second residential week - approximately two months later.

Upon return to her _____ Determiner after the first week of the workshop the CEO informed Sue that the quarterly meeting had to be rescheduled which meant the new date fell on the Thursday of her second residential week. Sue had a _____ Noun. She now had conflicting commitments - to be in the leadership program or to present the quarterly report. In the real world of course the CEO wins such a "yes - no" conflict. But Sue paused a _____ Noun and considered whether there was a "yes - and" possibility here.

She chose a creative and potentially _____ to way to honor both of her commitments. She decided to delegate the quarterly report presentation to two of the top people on her team. And she did a great job of setting them up to succeed.

When Sue asked them to take on the presentation task they Verb - Past Tense and said, "But Sue you are great at this and...it's the top Pronoun...are you sure about this?" Sue replied, "Yes, I know you can do it. You have seen me do the presentation so you know what happens and you know the Noun as well as I do. You'll do great. But I don't want you to just present the information, I also want you to Verb the material you will present - and I'll help you." Sue could feel their Noun but she knew they were ready for this next big step.

Over the next few weeks Sue coached and supported them, but made sure the responsibility for the presentation stayed in their hands Adverb that ultimately she would be still accountable for the outcomes.

When Sue returned for her second residential week she told us of her dilemma and what she chose to do about it.

On Thursday we paused the workshop and said to Sue, "We have to know what happened. Go call and find out how it went." Sue returned with a Verb - Present Tense report. The presentation had gone Adverb and the senior staff was Verb - Past Participle. The two presenters felt as though they had Verb - Past

Participle Olympic gold. The CEO had left a voice mail for Sue Verb - Present Tense her for her

Noun to delegate the task and for setting her people up to succeed so well. By enabling her people in this way Sue had created           Noun - Plural           all around.
