Home Alone

It was a Adjective and Adjective night, and I was home alone. I love or hate being home alone, because it means there is more chance of me Verb - Present ends in ING. Anyway, I was standing by the fridge, trying to find the best or worst thing to verb. Should I eat food? food? A small child teenager or adult? Finally I decided on the huge, Adjective left over chicken body part. I carried the plate of chicken same body part to the Noun, where I was planning to sit down and watch your family member. However, my Adjective plans were spoiled by a tap on the Noun. I Verb - Past Tense immediately. "Who could that be?" I thought. Suddenly I heard Verb - Present ends in ING coming from close by. I whipped around - there was no one there. I found this incredibly Adjective seeing as my house doesn't usually breathe. Then I saw some Noun on the Noun, dripping from the ceiling. I didn't think my tears had reached that high. I went to investigate, expecting the culprit to be nickname the Noun, as per usual - such a prankster! Again, there was nobody there. Now I was really Verb - Past Tense. Wasn't I meant to be home alone? I'd never been in the attic, where the dripping was coming from, so I assumed there must be something Verb - Present ends in ING up there. It was time to find out. I climbed up the Adjective Noun and lifted myself inside. It was completely Adjective except for a single refracted light ray coming from the other side of other room. I felt Noun - Plural down my body part. "Hello? Is it me you're looking for?" I heard a voice whisper Adjective. "What the eff

" I Verb - Past Tense. I still couldn't see anyone. Suddenly the light became a lot Adjective and lit up the whole attic. There, in the centre, was Lionel Ritchie, sitting by a colour piano and smiling broadly. I wept with emotion surprise. He was Verb - Present ends in ING, hence the dripping from the ceiling. I had never been so emotion in my life.

So that's the story of my Adjective experience being home alone. I will never fear it again - I look forward to seeing Adjective Lionel every day.

The End.
