Then, as he watched in amazement, the _____ Noun - Plural on his plate moved, undulated like a mass of thin, pallid _____ Noun - Plural. The whole mound of his spaghetti heaved atop his plate, seemed to wind in upon itself. And the sauce, the red sauce, began to look distinctly watery, distinctly biological, like blood and serum that had separated. He could see it bead on the _____ Adjective surface of each strand of pasta, like wax on the body of a freshly washed _____ Noun. Merle's stomach folded inside him. His hands, still itching, went below the lip of the table and _____ Verb - Past Tense his gut, pushed in a little in an attempt to settle it. But it got worse when he raised his eyes from the table. He looked out over the crowd again, and now most of them weren't people. They were monstrosities, horrors, deformed and twisted, hardly human. Verrill McKay, one of the town's biggest farmers, sat there large as life, a head atop a melting, squiggling mass of congealed flesh that brought to mind a Jell-O mold left too long in the sun, collapsing like a landslide over his chair.
