Road Trip Story

My first road trip was Adjective. When I turned 24 years old, my father lent me his car to go from Los Angeles to Chicago. I told my dad that my friend George was Verb - Present ends in ING with me, and he was bringing his Adjective Noun - Plural. My dad liked that George was going, because he was a Adjective Adjective adult, which made me think that my dad doesn't think of me as an Noun. When the day we were scheduled to leave arrived, George's Noun didn't arrive at my house until 5 p.m. when we agreed we would Verb - Base Form at 2 p.m.

It wasn't bad. I had been waiting for this Noun for a year. I could Verb - Base Form a little longer.

When Nancy arrived, we packed up her Noun and hit the Noun. I was friends with both of them, but George was my friend first. I started getting annoyed with them right away. Even though I had my Noun - Plural playing in the car, I could Adverb hear them in the back Verb - Present ends in ING and calling each other baby, sweetie, sweetheart, and other nauseating cute names. I didn't like it, but what was I going to Verb - Base Form?

George took over the wheel after we left California. He was Verb - Present ends in ING to Nancy the whole time. When we got near the Grand Canyon, Nancy started talking about how she always wanted to go see Noun - Plural. That was when George said those Adjective words I hated the most, "What my baby wants, my baby gets." He started going down a road that led to the Grand Canyon without even Verb - Present ends in ING. I started to get really Adjective, but decided not to say anything. It was really Adjective, but they didn't care. It turned out the road that led to the Grand Canyon closed after a certain time.

Nancy felt embarrassed, and George started Verb - Present ends in ING . After we got back on the highway, I Verb - Past Tense all the way to Chicago. George knew that I was bugged, so he tried to keep me company.
He even told Nancy to Verb - Base Form in the back, which she did. It was a Adjective drive. I couldn't believe I had to drive all the way back to Los Angeles with Noun - Plural .
