The Pumpkin Crop

The may be justly called one of the articles the farmer raises. There are many different varieties of this vegetable, but we think none is equal to the old-fashioned, yellow, field, for yield and goodness. For producing rich milk, it is one of the very best articles that can be given cows. Fed raw to hogs, they are useful by increasing the appetite.
We have been in the habit of raisingAdjective large crops of They like a rich, worm soil, with plenty of stable manure to feed on, and will stand drouth as any crop. But there are some difficulties to be overcome in getting the crop up and out of the way of insects, (bugs, &c.) After the plants are up, and the danger from frosts is past, then comes the "tug of war" with the bugs. The striped bugs come in swarms, and will in a short time, if left to themselves, destroy the crop. But in this case, " prevention is better than cure," and to prevent their attacks we sprinkle the plants, as soon as up, "with
," and find the "varmits" do not like to meddle with anything that is whited with this substance. In case the is washed off by rain, we sprinkle again, and continue to do so as often as necessary till the plants are out of the way of these "pestiferous critters." If spring up, pull them out by hand, or cut them out with a hoe. At harvest, the vines could not have been much over an acre, yet we gathered from it six large cart-bodies heaping full.
Now if any of your readers can tell a Adjective Story than this, which, by the way, is no less true than tough, I shall be glad to hear it. L.D.
